The Bank Comptroller of the State of Wisconsin, in his annual report just published, expreases himself thus sens bly with respect to a uniform national currency;—
During the compulsory withdrawal of State currency, in the years 1865 and 1863, it was the opinion of many that the pian of a national currency would have but a brief existence and be followed by the revival of our foreor system. It is now my settled opinion that this will nover occur; that the people will nover again be satisfied with anything short of a uniform national currency. I mean that which is issued by the United States government itself. The currency issued by national banks should give place to United States legal tender notes, and the bonds upon which the currency is based, or an amount equivalent thereto, be negotiated for and canoniled; but thus smuld be done in a gradual and satisfactory manner, so as to create no financial disaurhance. I think such a course would greatly relieve the general government, cause no serio is injury to any one and most the almost unanimous approvas of the people.
